Enculturational Discontinuities in the Musical Experience of the Wagogo Children of Central Tanzania

Kedmon Mapana

The Oxford Handbook of Children's Musical Cultures
Edited by Patricia Shehan Campbell and Trevor Wiggins

Print Publication Date: Dec 2012 Subject: Music, Ethnomusicology Online Publication Date: Nov 2012 DOI: 10.1093/oxfordhb/9780199737635.013.0031

Abstract

This article examines the musical enculturation process among the Wagogo people in Tanzania in order to understand their informal learning of culture (and musical culture). A framework is then proposed for the development of a music curriculum that removes enculturational discontinuities and helps sustain cultural identity. It is argued that enculturation is a natural process that need not be dismissed and discontinued as mandatory schooling moves children from their homes and families and into a formal learning environment. The songs, rhythms, and movements that children learn at home constitute are part of their deepest cultural roots. This music must be nurtured through a school curriculum that continues to build upon the local experiences of children’s early years.

Keywords: Tanzanian, children, traditional, music, music education, musical culture, learning, identity, curriculum