Educational Equity in Tanzania: The Imperiled Promise of Reform

Johnson M. Ishengoma
and
Deborah J. Youngman

As sub-Saharan African nations struggle to create viable infrastructure adequate to the needs of their complex, polyethnic societies, it has been widely recognized that general well-being in the postindependence era relies primarily on equal access to education, as differentially defined. Profiled here is the recent history of the United Republic of Tanzania's efforts to educate its people. Ideological intent, theoretical merits, and practical limitations of applied strategies, including current controversial reforms endorsed by extranational organizations, are discussed.

Johnson M. Ishengoma is a Lecturer at St. Augustine University of Tanzania where he also serves as Chair of Research, Consultancy, and Special Programs in the Publications Unit. He received his Bachelor of Arts in Education (Hons.) in 1985 and his Master of Arts in Education (1989) at the University of Dar es Salaam, Tanzania. During the 1998–1999 academic year, Mr. Ishengoma was a Hubert H. Humphrey Fellow at Boston University's School of Education. His research interests are in developmental studies, educational equity, and the function of NGOs.

Deborah J. Youngman serves on the Boston University faculty in the Department of Developmental Studies and Counseling at the School of Education and is the clinical placement coordinator for the graduate program in counseling psychology. In addition to graduate teaching responsibilities, she supervises clinical interns working with infants, children, adolescents, and adults in both conventional and alternative educational settings. Primary interest in lifespan moral development has led to recent research in moral development in later life, educational and vocational development in persons who are mentally ill, and the challenges to moral development among citizens of emerging democracies. Over the last five years, she has also directed the study of applied ethics among graduate students, postdoctoral fellows, and faculty at Tufts Medical School.